One of the most iconic cocktails of the era was the "Mint Julep." Originally hailing from the American South, this bourbon-based drink gained popularity in Paris due to its refreshing and aromatic nature. Served over crushed ice, with a sprig of mint delicately placed on top, the Mint Julep became synonymous with the carefree spirit of the jazz age.

An equally famous cocktail that became a staple of Parisian nights was the "Negroni." A perfect balance of bitter Campari, herbaceous vermouth, and the robust kick of gin, the Negroni was often sipped by artists and intellectuals deep in conversation at the city's vibrant cafes. Its rich crimson hue matched the seductive atmosphere of the period perfectly.

The "Sidecar" emerged as another beloved Parisian classic during the 1920s. Cognac, Cointreau, and lemon juice danced harmoniously in a glass, capturing the essence of the city's distinctive style. The Sidecar reigned supreme in the fashionable circles of Paris, with its smooth and citrusy taste becoming synonymous with effortless elegance.

Rediscovering Forgotten Recipes

The 1920s cocktail movement was not bound by traditional boundaries or formulas. It encouraged bartenders to embrace their creative instincts and experiment with different combinations, flavor profiles, and presentation styles. This environment gave birth to a myriad of forgotten cocktail recipes which have since been resurrected by mixologists seeking to pay homage to the golden age of mixology.

The "Bijou" is one such forgotten gem, whose recipe was rediscovered in the depths of dusty old cocktail books. Gin, sweet vermouth, and Chartreuse blend together to form a cocktail that perfectly encapsulates the refined sophistication of 1920s Paris. The Bijou's allure lies in its vibrant green color, reminiscent of the bohemian spirit that flowed through the veins of the city during that era.

For those seeking a more adventurous and exotic drink, the "Corpse Reviver No. 2" is sure to transport you back to the bustling bars of Paris. Composed of gin, lemon juice, Lillet, Cointreau, and a dash of absinthe, this cocktail delivers a refreshing and potent experience that lingers on the palate long after the sip.
