Demystifying Reader Signale Transfer

Reader Signale Transfer is a term coined by Blumenberg himself to describe the intricate process of transmitting signals between the reader and the text. It refers to the reader's interpretation of the text and the subsequent transfer of meaning from the text to the reader's understanding. This notion emphasizes the dynamic relationship between the reader and the text, highlighting the active role the reader plays in constructing meaning.

Blumenberg argues that the reader is not a passive recipient of knowledge but an active participant in the process of interpretation. By engaging with the text, the reader brings their own experiences, beliefs, and biases, which shape their understanding of the material. This process of transfer can be seen as a dialogue between the reader and the text, where each influences and enriches the other.
