Ghostwriting is the Most Rewarding Form of Freelance Writing

There is a certain joy associated with helping another person tell their story.

Ghostwriting requires a unique and challenging set of skills. Unlike other forms of writing, in ghostwriting you need to tell the story from the point-of-view of another person, in their voice and delivering their message.

However, there is far more to being a ghostwriter, or any other kind of freelance writer, than just telling a story. You have to understand that you are running business, and treat each contract as a project. In other words, you need project managements skills. And as with any other kind of project, you'll be interviewing, running meetings, doing research, writing letters and contracts, handling changes and communicating with your client.

Ghostwriting is unique, because you are the writer but not the author of the work. Your name will not, under normal conditions, be on the cover. In fact, your work may not be acknowledged at all! That is, except in the form of a good paycheck at regular intervals in the project.
