A violent noise, bearing in it the meaning of a wake-up call, mixed with the sound of night rain on the roof of the fence, from outside the front door echoing in. I was startled, opened my eyes. And the shock awakens.

My first feeling is that at this time, the night is very late, the night is lying in the bottom with the deep darkness of the night. And I, turning off the lights, getting into bed at night, I got a good night's sleep. The city is struggling. Rain knits the nets all over the place. Around my place, the sea of darkness thick. Who's here at this hour? Is the hustle and bustle of a man calling the door? I became myself, closed my eyes, tried to sleep, then the noise, it was a bang on the door, re-emerged, along with a call:

"Welcome! Are you home?"

It's me. But who's the caller! From the day I arrived at the chalet in the alley behind Tan Dinh market, I was great, almost completely, with night life, friends playing knowing that, no one came to look at this hour anymore. I resented getting out of bed, walking in the dark, finding my way to the front door, asking loudly:

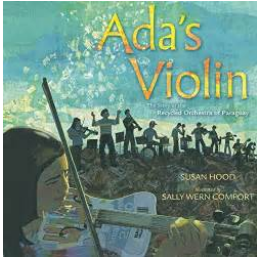

"Someone?"

The sound of outsiders, sleaze, choke:

"Far here, can you come in?"

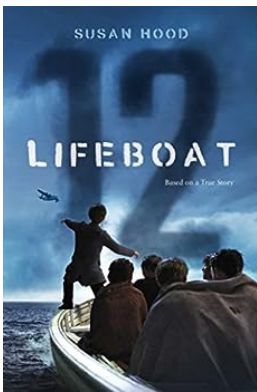

So the drunk, waiting for a night of heavy rain to break my sleep is Vien, an old friend, not very close, has not seen for a long time. I looked up, didn't know what Vien came to find me for. And why is his door banging so tempered, so alarmed? I must be in the middle of a drunken rage, and I'd like to get drunk, and in the morning, Vien invited me to some bar that's open at this hour. Well, no, I can't. I'm out of the night world, the foggy world, the world of drunkenness no longer knows what heaven is. Out. A long time ago. And never come back.

I asked, without opening the door, the voice appeared uncomfortable, telling Vien that I was annoyed:
