Ginsburg excelled academically and attended Cornell University, where she met her future husband, Martin D. Ginsburg. After graduating as one of the top students in her class, she faced discrimination when applying to law schools due to her gender. Despite the obstacles, Ginsburg was accepted into Harvard Law School and became one of the few women in her class.

During her time at Harvard, Ginsburg initially struggled to balance her studies with family responsibilities. However, she persevered and transferred to Columbia Law School after her husband accepted a job in New York City. As an advocate, she co-authored the first law casebook on sex discrimination, helping to raise awareness of the gender biases in the American legal system. Ginsburg argued several landmark cases on gender equality before the Supreme Court, winning five out of the six cases she presented.

One such groundbreaking case was Reed v. Reed in 1971, where she represented Sally Reed in challenging an Idaho law discriminating against women in estate administration. This case marked the first time the Court recognized that the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment applied to women.
