Silas Oaktree is on the hunt. After Kentucky's Daniel Boone Forest burned to the ground (which had nothing to do with him, promise), Silas Oaktree is looking to make a new home – and name for himself – in Nashville.

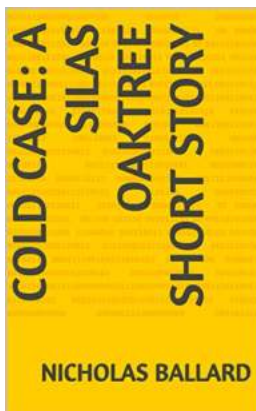

Things aren't looking good. His first detective job is a dead end, and if he doesn't solve it, his one chance for making a living for his wife and himself is ruined. But with the murder case over fifteen years old, the killer gone dormant – Oaktree’s promise of justice to a still-grieving father looks empty.

So when everyone else has given up, Oaktree makes one last, desperate gamble to draw the murderer out of hiding. All his training and gut instincts are riding on the thinnest rail of chance.

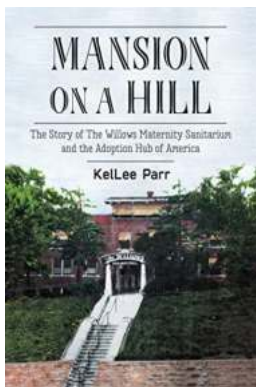

But if Oaktree is to build his future life in Tennessee, it means destroying someone else for their mistakes in a past and buried life. A killer, yes, but someone like who feels pain and regret, and wants nothing more than to move on.

The world is not so forgiving. And if Silas Oaktree is to find redemption, it is going to take all the grit he has to see the job through.
