"Michel Delifer left war-torn Lebanon for the United States as a young man and pursued a successful career in insurance before retiring to Southern Arizona. With this memoir he describes the events that brought him to insurance capital Hartford, Connecticut, providing a detailed look of the reinsurance business and his rise through its ranks, interspersed with personal stories of family and finding himself.

Delifer, an affable narrator, tells his story with humor: learning the ropes of a high-powered industry involved cultural challenges, like adapting to booze-fueled lunches (he didn't care for alcohol) and collegial conversations about sports, his knowledge of which was nonexistent. But his story of assimilation into the American mainstream is heavy on business minutiae, which causes the narrative to periodically lose steam. He's at his best when talking about his early struggles, his personal growth and his awakening to what he considers the darker side of the insurance business.

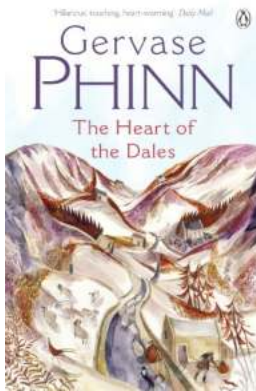

His goal, Delifer says, is to give an honest account of himself to new immigrants whom he hopes will encounter the good fortune he enjoyed."
