Twelve-year-old Henry Marshall is in trouble! The car crash that claimed his mother's life four years earlier has turned his father into an alcoholic. Not long after, Henry was diagnosed with cystic fibrosis, a condition that's made him considerably smaller than anyone his age and the object of every bully at school. The only good things in his life right now are his loving grandparents, his best friend, and the old red barn on his grandparents' property Henry and his friends use as a club house.

After taking a particularly humiliating pummeling after school one day, a tear-streaked Henry peddles his bike to the "West End" and perches himself atop a chrome stool across from his grandfathers work bench and spots a very old fan.

Curiosity, and lack of anything better to do, prompts Henry to plug in the fan, and to his surprise it rattles to life. As the fan blows away the tears from Henry's face, he speaks into the fan, "Luke, I am your father." He snuffles and says the phrase again, "Luke, I am your father." The fan giving the desired vocal effect, he smiles and says robustly the third time, "Luke, I am your father!"...and that's when he hears an indiscernible but very human voice speaking back to him through the fan!. And if that isn't weird enough Henry and his friends soon discover the voice isn't from the area...or the present time!

Join Henry and his friends as they discover the unfathomable trials being endured by a boy their own age, separated by 4,000 miles and fifty years! Will they be able to help their new friend escape the brutality and certain death that await him?
