The Entrepreneur is an engaging business odyssey of one man’s accomplishments in corporate America. But — it is also more. For those of us who know North Carolina and who respect the author for his contributions to our local business community, the story goes well beyond to specific phases of the author’s business life: Moreover, this book is a documentation of the “South’s rise” in industrial expertise during the last quarter century.

After spending some years with one of the nation’s greatest corporations, the author brought his knowledge and experience back to his native area. He introduced to Monroe, North Carolina, the opportunities of high-skilled industry. North Carolina did not then possess technological “know-how,” but Jim Nisbet was alert to the state’s greatest asset—available labor with a strong will to work—and Allvac Metals became one of the first companies to bring diversification of the economy to the Carolinas.
