From the earliest days of his military career, Reeder had shown tremendous dedication to the cause. He fought fiercely for justice and righteousness, always putting the needs of his men above his own. His troops respected him immensely, considering him both a leader and a friend.

Battles and Victories

The Colonel's greatest feats took place on the battlefield. His strategic genius and tactical prowess allowed him to outmaneuver even the most formidable opponents. He led his troops to victory after victory, pushing the boundaries of what was once thought possible.

One of his most memorable triumphs occurred during the Battle of Greenfield. Outnumbered and facing seemingly insurmountable odds, Colonel Red Reeder devised a plan so audacious that his fellow generals called it impossible. However, his unwavering belief in the abilities of his troops proved them wrong.

Under the Colonel's command, the Northern Generals executed a brilliantly coordinated attack, catching their enemies off guard. The battle raged fiercely throughout the day, but at nightfall, victory belonged to Colonel Red Reeder and his men. The battlefield was strewn with enemy forces in retreat, and the Colonel's troops emerged unscathed.

A Beloved Hero and His Legacy

Colonel Red Reeder's numerous acts of heroism earned him the respect and admiration of both his allies and enemies. His leadership style was unique, as he genuinely cared for the well-being of his troops. Many soldiers credited their survival and accomplishments to the Colonel's steadfast guidance and support.

Upon his retirement from the military, Colonel Red Reeder continued to serve his community. He established a foundation to provide aid and assistance to veterans in need, ensuring that their sacrifices would not be forgotten.

Remembering Colonel Red Reeder

Although many years have passed since the time of Colonel Red Reeder, his legacy lives on. Books and articles have been written about his bravery and exceptional leadership. Statues have been erected in his honor, reminding future generations of the impact one individual can have.

Colonel Red Reeder remains an unforgettable figure in the history of the Northern Generals, a shining example of valor and dedication. His name will forever echo through the annals of time, reminding us of the extraordinary actions that can be achieved in the face of adversity.

Once a friend asked, “Why are Americans interested in the Civil War? Why is it studied when it is out of date?”

Not only is this war part of our heritage, but the unequal struggle between Americans, that lasted a surprising four years, has held the keen interest of millions of people since the surrender at Appomattox in April, 1865.

Although it may be called “the first of the modern wars,” the tactics of the Civil War are out of date. It was fought at a transitory time in warfare, when rifled muskets and artillery had begun to convert warfare into a long-range business. Most of the generals, accustomed only to the older, smooth-bore, short-range weapons, had not discovered the terrible error of simple and direct assault on fortifications, an error that later generals repeated in the First World War. Basic elements of the strategy employed by the Union in the Civil War are worthy of study, and are still effective.

Of prime interest in the Civil War is the way generals led their men. Civil War lessons in leadership are good for all time.

Early in the Civil War, Secretary of the Navy Gideon Welles talked about the faulty leadership of many senior officers fighting for the Union. He said they did not lack education (many of them were engineers), but they did not possess the art of controlling men, and could not direct large bodies of soldiers in offensive warfare. He said two other indispensable traits lacking were audacity and fierce desire for encounter. With the future of the Union and men’s lives depending on numbers of inexperienced and incompetent leaders, these faults deepened the terror of the Nation’s worst tragedy.

Effective leadership is hard work. Taking care of men requires thoughtfulness and labor.

There are endless combinations of traits and qualities of leadership which successful and unsuccessful soldiers may possess. A homely way of summing up the actions and traits required in an excellent leader is, "You have to be yourself and you have to be good." But this simple expression, like every definition of the qualities required for leadership, fails to detail the necessary traits. No general statement, or text, on the art of leadership can supply the how that will solve every situation.

That is impossible, for no man leads exactly as another. The Civil War leadership of Major General "Uncle John" Sedgwick, warm and friendly, was far removed from the cold methods of Brigadier General Ranald Slidell Mackenzie, which obtained the same results. There are no "musts" that decree exactly how a man should lead. The leader's brain, his background, training, personality, initiative, alertness, common sense, and other factors are involved.

In this book are the traits, characteristics, and personalities of numerous Union generals. To bind the whole together and show how the leadership qualities or lack of them affected results, the framework and strategy of the war as well as parts of the political background are included.

Personal characteristics ingrained in leaders, perhaps early in their lives, influenced the campaigns and the war. The traits which General Sherman exhibited in Georgia and in the Carolinas not only influenced the strategy of the war, and its results, but the feelings of people for over one hundred years.

After the Civil War, Sherman explained his success as a leader by saying, "The true way to be popular with troops is not to be free and familiar with them, but to make them believe you know more than they do.” Followers usually know less than the leader, but if General Sherman was serious after that comma, he was on thin ice, for bluffing is a dangerous expedient.

Jealousies and conflicts in personalities are the grit that make the job of getting along with people challenging. Ability to work productively with others, and the ability to understand people, are two important factors in the success of a business man. They are also vitally significant to a military leader in both peace and war.
